

The Look Ecommerce Relevant Insights

BY NICOLAS GOMEZ

Introduction

In this project, data analysis made it possible to reveal behavioral patterns and strategic opportunities that go beyond the figures. Each insight was interpreted with the aim of transforming the information into real and actionable business decisions.

🌧️ 1. Autumn Seasonality Boosts Sales

By observing the monthly evolution of transactions, a sustained growth was identified during the autumn months.

Interpretation: This pattern indicates that customer behavior is influenced by the season, possibly due to events or weather conditions that favor the purchase of certain products.

Suggested Action: Prepare seasonal marketing campaigns and increase stock between September and November to capitalize on demand.

2. China: The Main Business Engine

China not only leads in the number of sales but also in total revenue.

Interpretation: This country represents a highly consolidated market with great potential for organic growth.

Suggested Action: Prioritize loyalty strategies in this country—such as VIP programs or exclusive launches—that strengthen retention and increase the average ticket size.

💰 3. More Sales Do Not Always Mean More Profit

The data shows an inverse trend between the quantity sold and the profit margin.

Interpretation: It is likely that volume discounts or pricing strategies are reducing profitability.

Suggested Action: Review the discount policy and apply price sensitivity analysis to find the optimal balance point between volume and margin.

👩 4. Women Generate More Revenue Than Men

The female segment reached 1.5 million in revenue, surpassing the 1.2 million from men.

Interpretation: Although men make larger purchases in countries like Brazil or South Korea, women sustain the largest volume and frequency of purchases, especially in China and the United States.

Suggested Action: Design gender-segmented campaigns, prioritizing personalized experiences and product recommendations based on purchasing behavior.

🧥 5. Suits & Sport Coats: The Premium Product

This category, despite not being the best-selling, presents the highest profit margin (63.59%).

Interpretation: There is a premium niche that values quality and is willing to pay more for differentiated products.

Suggested Action: Boost this line with exclusivity strategies (limited editions, collaborations, or aspirational branding) that strengthen its value perception.

6. Jeans and Sweaters: High Volume, Low Margin

Both categories lead in revenue and profit, but due to the high volume of sales, not necessarily because of their individual profitability.

Suggested Action: Analyze production costs and explore gradual price increases or strategic bundles to improve profitability without affecting demand.

7. “Potential Loyalists”: The Young Generation Driving Growth

Almost 40% of the customer base belongs to the “Potential Loyalists” segment, with young people under 25 years old predominating.

Interpretation: It is a clear opportunity to strengthen long-term loyalty.

Suggested Action: Implement rewards programs, exclusive benefits for repeat purchases, and communication through digital channels relevant to this audience.

8. Customer Retention: Seasonal Peaks and Dips

The retention rate peaks in March and declines between September and November, recovering in December.

Interpretation: The company experiences cyclical retention fluctuations, probably associated with seasonal changes or specific promotions.

Suggested Action: Launch reactivation campaigns before the last quarter, to sustain the relationship with customers before the high season.

🌐 9. Cultural and Gender Differences in Purchasing Behavior

Men: Larger purchases in Brazil and South Korea.

Women: Higher concentration of purchases in China and the United States.

Suggested Action: Personalize the offer by country and gender, adjusting advertising messages, product mix, and prices to regional preferences.

General Conclusion

The analysis reveals that the company's success does not depend solely on sales volume, but on how profitability, seasonality, and loyalty are balanced.

The biggest opportunities lie in strengthening the relationship with young customers, boosting high-margin categories, and leveraging seasonal peaks with proactive strategies.